Correctional Institutions are prisons with fences, razor wire or ribbon, electronic detection systems, perimeter towers with armed correctional officers and/or officers in roving perimeter vehicles. Most of these inmates do not reside in cells, but in open bay dormitories with bunk beds. Some exceptions include those confined for disciplinary or security reasons, and those on death row. These facilities are divided into seven levels of security ranging from minimum custody facilities to maximum custody facilities. About 83.5% of the Florida prison population is housed in a major institution or annex.

Work Camps/Re-Entry Centers are minimum to medium custody facilities, surrounded by fences and razor ribbon. Inmates are usually transferred to a work camp after completing part of their sentences at a correctional institution and demonstrating satisfactory adjustment. Most of these work camps are located next to correctional institutions enabling the sharing of facilities like laundry and health services. The inmates housed at these facilities may be assigned to community and public work squads. Their jobs include cleaning up roadways and right-of-ways, grounds and building maintenance, painting, building construction projects, moving state offices, and cleaning up forests. About 12.4% of the prison population resides in work camps and re-entry centers.

Community Release Centers (CRC) house four categories of community custody inmates: (1) inmates participating in community work release and work at paid employment in the community (CWR); (2) inmates who work in a support capacity for the center (CWA); (3) inmates who receive transitional services (PWR) which include substance abuse treatment/programming, educational/vocational services, self-betterment programs, and skills necessary for employment and re-entry into society prior to CWR or CWA placement; and (4) the Community-based Therapeutic inmates (CTP) who receive transitional services, in lieu of placement into paid employment (CWR) or center work assignment (CWA). Inmates must be within 6 to 36 months of their release date, depending on their assignment. No sex offenders may be assigned to community release centers. Those assigned to CWA perform such tasks as food service, maintenance of the center, or assignment to work squads. There are no perimeter fences and inmates must remain at the CRC when they are not working or attending programs outside the CRC. Inmates participating in paid employment must submit a percentage of their net earnings to pay for the following: 55% for room and board, 10% placed in savings for their release, and, if appropriate, 10% to pay restitution to their victims and court costs/fines, 10% for family support, and 10% for other costs as determined by the Department and the inmate. More than 3,500 inmates participate in Florida's community release programs annually, with about 3.6% of the prison population enrolled at any given time.

Road Prisons house minimum custody inmates and have perimeter fences. Most of these inmates work on community work squads and the highways doing road work. Their jobs also include support services to state agencies such as collecting recycling materials and moving furniture. Less than 1% of the prison population is housed in road prisons.
